

Means of Escapism: A Guide to Becoming a Fairy

A black and white photograph of a dark wooden piano. In the background, there are lace curtains with a floral pattern hanging from a window. The lighting is dramatic, with the piano and curtains in shadow and the lace patterns visible.

chapter 1

Burnout

Having a show is so much fun

It's like 3 months of anxiety, 4 hours of being nervous and awkward at the opening, then boom, major depression

@ItsBritneyMeme

I accidentally became important at work and it's ruining my life.

born to say hiiii :3

forced to say hope this email finds you well

i can't do this anymore i mean i can and i will but obviously i can't fucking do this anymore

i have got to get more unemployed

I hope this email finds you well never finds you. I hope you find yourself. I hope you are free.

Brakedown

I'll be okay I just need a coffee, ibuprofen, 8 hrs alone on my phone, a new show to watch unperturbed, to never get an email again, a burst of productivity that validates my

chapter 4
Retirement home for 20-something year old girls this is a safe space for girlies who are overwhelmed by a deep sense of revulsion and horror towards society and the way it distorts our natural inclinations for love and community and subjects us to constant and inescapable alienation and stimulation and who just want to quit their jobs and flee to the hills and be left alone to create

Therapist: "You said you were disappointed with life and how the world operates. What were your expectations?"

Me:

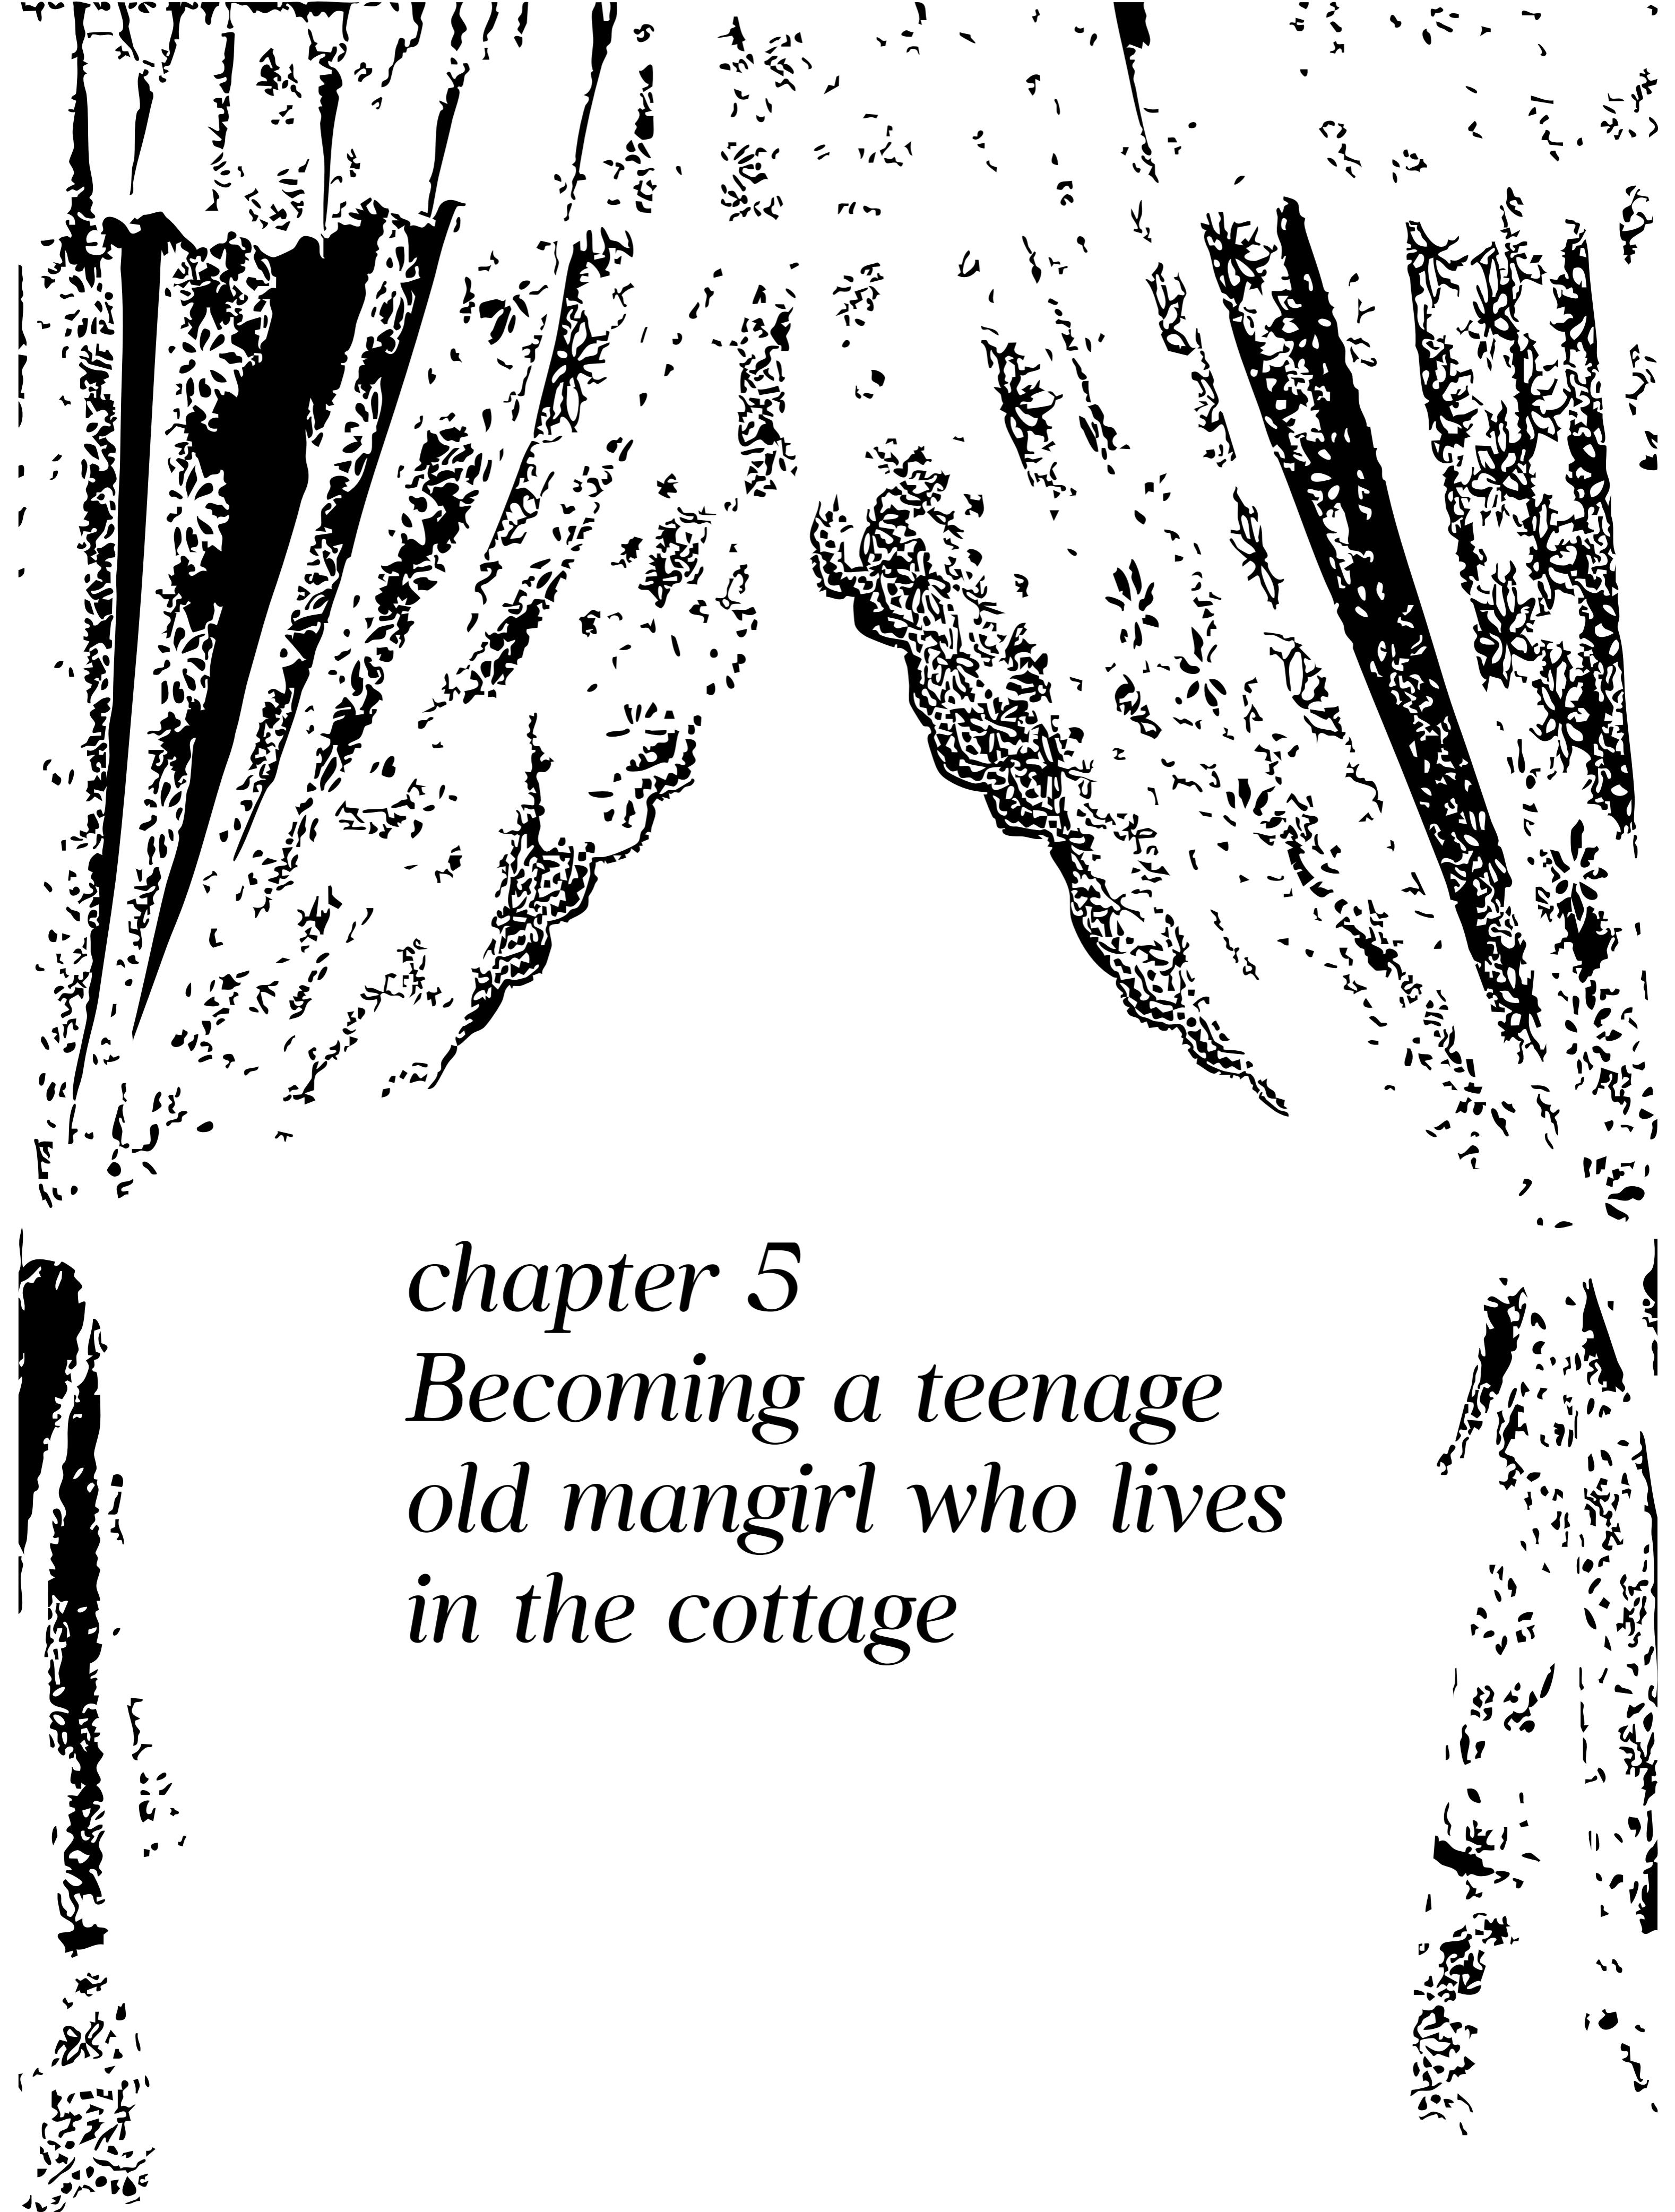

While retirement typically occurs, after completing a career and saving and investing for it, a new trend is emerging among Gen Z career professionals called "micro-retirement." Micro-retirements involve taking a one to two-week break from work every 12 to 18 months.

Gen Z is using micro-retirement to avoid burnout, find greater fulfillment in their work, and enhance their overall well-being. However, it's not just Gen-Z:
